Distance Learning

The ABCs of Online Course Design

Alignment:

Every course, whether online or face-to-face, should have clear alignment between the written objectives, the taught content and the tested learning. What are you teaching? How are you teaching it? How will you know if students learned it?

Balance:

To address a variety of student learning styles, it is critical that you utilize a balance of different activities and assessment strategies. Students should have opportunities to work in a style that is comfortable to them, while at other times being challenged beyond their comfort zone. This balance creates a healthy tension in your course.

Clarity:

The most common complaint from students concerning their online courses is a lack of clarity. Clear navigation, consistent layout and understandable instructions help students move through a course without difficulty. Be overt in explaining to students where to begin, what to do next, how to submit assignments, etc.

- ❖ Data from the past few years shows that out of 20.2 million college students in America, almost 5.8 million of them, nearly 30%, were enrolled in some form of distance education
- ❖ Undergraduate participation in distance education over the last three years grew from 21% to 32%
- ❖ The rapid increase in online learning is confirmed when one considers the fact that in 2003-2004 only 16% of undergraduates participated in distance education
